NACVA Presents State-of-the-Art Business Valuation Training in Denver
Denver, CO—What is your business really worth? What happens to your children if something happens to you and you don't have an estate plan? What happens to your 401k plan when your company merges with another company? The National Association of Certified Valuation Analysts (NACVA) presents these topics at the Business Valuation Training Center at the Hyatt Regency Tech Center, July 11-16, 2005. The week-long workshop is designed for accountants and financial professionals who are looking to undertake a new consulting career within the accounting industry.

What is a Business Valuation?

Businesses need to be valued when a business is bought or sold, when a divorce or partnership has disputes, or when estate taxes need to be determined. The workshop applies theories of appraising a business through real world examples, techniques and case law studies. "We want our practitioners to be recognized as industry leaders in the field of business valuation," said Parnell Black, NACVA CEO. "NACVA is committed to deliver state-of-the-art training to help our professionals build successful practices." The leading-edge curriculum is developed and taught by practitioners who are utilizing the skills they teach

Colorado State Chapter Meets

NACVA's Colorado State Chapter will host a lunch meeting says president Ed Cordes on Monday, July 11, 2005 at the workshop. "The meeting provides a great opportunity for local members to discuss the latest developments in the business valuation industry in Denver," he said. "It's a great way to get your name out in the business valuation community for referrals." The Training Center brings experts from many consulting disciplines to venues where participants can obtain advanced training to further their careers and provide additional services to their clients.
